in graham greene s thrillers and the 1930s brian diemert examines the first and most prolific phase of graham greene s career demonstrating the close relationship between greene s fiction and the political economic social and literary contexts of the period situating greene alongside other young writers who responded to the worsening political climate of the 1930s by promoting social and political reform diemert argues that greene believed literature could not be divorced from its social and political milieu and saw popular forms of writing as the best way to inform a wide audience diemert traces greene s adaptation of nineteenth century romance thrillers and classical detective stories into modern political thrillers as a means of presenting serious concerns in an engaging fashion he argues that greene s popular thrillers were in part a reaction to the high modernism of writers such as james joyce gertrude stein and virginia woolf whose esoteric experiments with language were disengaged from immediate social concerns and inaccessible to a large segment of the reading public the pyjama girl was an unknown woman found dumped by a road near Albury in 1934. She had been brutally murdered. Who was she and who killed her? This became Australia's great unsolved crime for decades. The body was preserved in formalin, and her image circulated around the world. The mystery fascinated the nation, and for some, it became an obsession. Ten years later, the body was identified, and a man was convicted of her manslaughter. The case it seemed was neatly solved, but this solution, advanced by police, accepted by the courts and the media, and since repeated endlessly, was a lie. Behind the lie is a troubling story of murder and obsession, of a wild conspiracy theory of police corruption and a miscarriage of justice, and of a real killing which floated free from reality and became a myth.
